Introduction

The Model is convening a symposium that focuses on key themes addressed in the exhibition. Chaired by Sarah Glennie and joined by Anna Morvern, a migrant rights activist who has practised human rights law for many years, the symposium invites artists Elaine Hoey, Gülsün Karamustafa and Cengiz Tekin to discuss their work. The symposium looks at the role of the artist in a time of political crisis to ask how their work can contribute to meaningful discourse, solidarity and strategies of resistance.

The methodologies used in the making of artwork can often act as a catalyst for alternative ways of being and other realities. In the context of this proposition, what are the possibilities of art as a form of resistance and can artists find solidarity with people at the borders? Does Art have the capacity to connect with the empathic mind of the viewer and in doing so, connect with a more tolerant society? We invite the speakers today to respond to these key questions.

He lives and works in Diyarbakir.

Screening

Douglas Gordon;
I Had Nowhere To Go

The Model is delighted to present the Irish premiere of Douglas Gordon's film I Had Nowhere to Go, based on the autobiography of groundbreaking experimental filmmaker, Jonas Mekas. The twentieth century has produced millions of refugees, exiles, and stateless, displaced persons. In 1944 at the age of 22 Mekas was forced from his home in Lithuania by the threat of Nazi persecution. Propelled by the need to create rather than destroy, to move on and to make sense, he became one of the greatest documentarians of the human experience. I Had Nowhere To Go is his story of exile as told by the critically acclaimed artist Douglas Gordon.
